ABSTRACT

Regulatory guidance for environmental monitoring specifies the pathways for monitoring and specific samples for those pathways. As local site demographics change, environmental pathways as well as environmental sampling locations change or disappear. In particular problems arise for the sampling of milk and vegetation. In situations where the guidance is unclear or confusing, consideration of the fundamental philosophy behind the guidance can provide additional insight.

This presentation looks some of the issues concerning vegetation sampling and considers the fundamental paradigm of environmental monitoring and how it can be for guidance in resolving sampling issues.
